During the years that followed she appeared in ordinary roles. Five years after adopting the stage as a career, she appeared in the principal role of Charles Klein's "Daughters of Men" and Channing Pollock's "Little Grey Lady." In 1907, eight years after her first appearance she became the star in "The Lion and the Mouse" and followed that with the dramatic triumph in "The Sins of Society." On February 2, 1910, Miss Donnelly created an entirely new vogue in dramatic acting by her fine portrayal of the title role in Henry W. Savage's great production of the French play 'Madam X," and later created another great wave of popularity by her re-markable acting in A. H.
